Still later, the yellow-haired girl, who knew only the rough but kindly courtesies of the mining camp, felt the glamour of princely favors—but that is another story as Kipling says.

Not all his days of poverty were spent in drowsyl deleness. While his wife washed, Bassick cut wood on the mountains. He prospected some, and over on Tyndall Mountain there are still the outlines of a tunnel which he began. But the work here was intermittent, depending somewhat on the courfesty of Johnson, said Bassick one day. The runnin' that tunnel yet. I guess'—"Oh, ye are, are ye?" "As for Bassick, the sense of to him unlimited wealth took the form of sardines—unlimited wealth took the form of sardines—unlimited oilsoaked, tin-boxed sardines. The day a $12 check came down from Blackhawk for a mere handful of ore sent up for treatment Bassick was found before Johnson's supply store, seated on the plank walk, his jaws dripping with oil, a dozen empty sardine boxes strewn about him, and a dozen other handled knife.

"Yes,' he said, 'I like these things, and his it would remain. Everywhere his credit was unlimited. Under his direction systematic development was begun. A tunnel was driven $20 feet to meet the point of junction all necessary machinery was placed, and in a few months where Bassick struck his pick the little town of Quireda sprang into existence. The cactus and prairie dog were displaced, and the sardines I want, b'gosh.'

(From the Lineaster Intelligencer.)
They have a mayor down in Macon Ga., who does not let the glamour of achieved greatness dim the clearness of vision with which in childhood's happy hour he saw and comprehended the things occurring round about him and forming part of his everyday life and experience. When in his boyish love of nature he held communion with its visible forms he interpreted its various languages with an accuracy and understanding that have stood him in good stead, now that he has become the chief ruler of his native town. A spell of dry weather in and around Macon, very similar from all accounts to wanted rain he would proceed to catch a moccasin snake, or a "coach-whip" or "chicken" snake or some other of the harmless species with which the fields abound, turn it up with the shiny side of its anatomy toward the glowing heav-ens, and in the desired time would come the refreshing showers, sure enough. He remembered that this scheme never falled, and he so told his astonished fellow citizens of Macon when they called upon him to explain the meaning of the following singular advertisement in a local paper of that town:

"Snakes Wanted—I will pay $1 each for one black snake, one chicken snake, one coachwhip and one moccasin, dead or nive, delivered to me at the city hall; will purchase from person first applying. S. B. Price, Mayor City of Macon." This modest announcement brought to the mayor of Macon an abundance of the mayor of Macon an abundance of snakes of the sort asked for-more, in fact, than the sagacious magistrate needed. They came by scores; some in boxes, some tied on the ends of poles, while some, it is chronicled, crawled up to the mayor's office on their own account. The veracious and esteemed Macon Telegraph tells us that the mayor took enough snakes to decorate every tree around the snakes to decorate every tree around the snakes to decorate every tree around the city hall, and that almost before he had completed the task great banks of clouds rolled over the heavens, the mayor, whose greatness even permitted him to wink facetiously while this was going on, trium-phantly assuring his admiring constitu-ents that he knew he had a sure thing. The downpour of rain that followed this reptilian appeal to Jupiter Pluvius, under magisterial auspices, fully justified the experiment, and doubtless assures the mayor of another renomination. "Refereshing showers," the Telegraph greefully exclaims, "were the cause of much joy and gladness. All nature took on a brighter and happier look and everybody felt better."
